St. George

April's News

■ St George "not a Special Day"

As English readers celebrate St. George's Day spare a thought for those who like to do so in the English pub. Having had a good St. Patrick's night last month, with an hour's extension granted by local magistrates, Tony Bennett, landlord of the Otter in Drayton, Norwich, applied for a bar extension to midnight on April 23rd. Norwich magistrates told him that St. George's Day was not a recognised holiday and that his application had been rejected. The same magistrate's allowed some Norwich pubs to have an extension for the Chinese New Year!

■ Gangsters Bribing Indian Call Centres

The City Editor of London's Evening Standard has reported that staff at call centres in India are being bribed by organised crime and industrial spies to help them hack into the computer systems of British firms. He said that in at least two cases local IT staff working in India for UK institutions were involved in what industry sources say were "security issues" in what is described as the tiniest fraction of a far larger problem.

■ Asylum Seekers' Sham Marriages

A leaked internal Home Office e-mail to immigration minister Beverley Hughes reveals that officials estimated there were about 15,000 sham marriages each year in Britain, ten times the published official estimate. This news was prompted by the whistle blowing of a senior marriage registrar in London who said that many asylum seekers are undergoing sham ceremonies to stay in the country. She said that in some cases the couples did not even speak the same language.

Once such a marriage takes place, EU legislation says that after serving 12 months probation he or she is granted indefinite "leave to remain". After a further five years he or she is free to apply for British citizenship.

The registrar also claimed that many asylum seekers are obtaining up to three birth certificates when they register new babies in order to use them to gain entry to Britain for infants from abroad. "We have had many cases of Africans and Turks buying several certificates for the same child and importing children of their relatives or friends," she said.

■ Tipton Taliban Hailed As Heroes

Hassan Butt

Hassan Butt, a self-styled British jihad recruiter who claims to have sent 400 'British' Muslims to fight the Coalition in Afghanistan, has called for the freed "Tipton Taliban" to be feted here as Islamic heroes. He has also said that Tony Blair remained a "legitimate target" for assassination.

Butt said that Midlands Muslims should organise Jubilee-style street parties to celebrate the release of the three Tipton Muslim men.

Butt, former Wolverhampton University student, says he is on police bail after being arrested under the Anti-Terrorism Act 2000 last November. He has been accused of being involved in a wide scale plot to bomb President Bush's motor cavalcade during his visit to Britain last November. His British and Pakistani passports have been confiscated.

■ Asylum Seekers Before Students at Glasgow University

Glasgow University has approved a scheme to house teenage asylum seekers alongside university students in an 87-bed complex of flats at Fir Court, Maryhill.

The flats were built and designed specifically for students at the university and the change of use to a hostel for asylum seekers is not what the students, or the local council, expected.

Glasgow BNP is asking why the City Council has started throwing open the doors of all manner of public institutions to asylum seekers when in the City's savage winters over the years British-born homeless were left to rot and die of hypothermia on the streets.

■ Labour Councillor Downloaded Child Porn

Former Labour councillor and teacher Nelson Bland described himself as "sad and pathetic" after admitting 16 charges related to perverted porn sites at Reading Magistrates' Court.. He had been working as an IT teacher at Denefield School, Reading.

Meanwhile the Lib Dem spring conference voted to allow children of sixteen to appear in hardcore porn films.

HALF A MILLION VOTES WILL BE A VICTORY

Even if the BNP fails to have one MEP elected on June 10th, half a million votes looks attainable. Whatever the outcome, it will have established itself as the most successful nationalist movement this country has seen.

The proof of this is the opposition, particularly from the dirty tricks brigade, that we have aroused. As Nick Griffin pointed out last month in his Chairman's article, the old parties are so worried about the votes the BNP is attracting that they got together at a top-level secret meeting in Yorkshire in February on how to deal with the BNP 'problem'. Michael Howard's escapade in Burnley, where his gutter abuse of BNP supporters managed to recruit several hundred new members nationally, was just one outcome of the secret meeting.

Then we have the expected opposition from the Marxist left, ranging from Trade Union bosses completely out of touch with their members, to Red Ken Livingstone getting in to bed with Trevor Phillips of the CRE to form the 'Unite Against Fascism' movement.

With a slightly increasing number of exceptions, the media generally is either continuing its boycott of the BNP where they cannot find anything bad to say, or running 'exposures' on a member who was involved in some minor fracas with the militants leftists in the past, or who made some immature comment in his youth.

The media does not persecute the many 'respectable' New Labour politicians who were once either members or sympathisers of the Communist Party, including Jack Straw, Peter Mandelson and John Reid. On the question of BNP boycotts it was laughable to read that Julian Peel Yates, a good liberal who headed the West's election mission to report on Russia's presidential election, stated that Putin's men "had denied opponents a fair hearing in the media"!

The call has gone out for all BNP members to do there bit, particularly by joining local leafleting and canvassing teams. Apart from making donations to our election funds, those members and supporters who for some reason cannot be active should make the effort to talk to and phone friends and family on the importance of their "giving the BNP a try". They should explain why the big smear technique is in operation. And those politically naive friends who think that voting Liberal Democrat will change Tory and Labour misrule should be told that this is not an answer: for the Lib Dems are a major part of the problem.

What Happens When Mandela Goes?

While George Bush has been busy playing world supercop, with Tony Blair as his special constable in Kosova and Sierra Leone, the Marxist dictator of Zimbabwe, Robert Mugabe, has been allowed to get away literally with murder. His principal 'weapon of mass destruction' has been to confiscate the lands of white farmers, which five years ago gave Zimbabwe a food surplus and earned the country foreign currency through its tobacco sales. The farms are now so inefficient that 90 per cent of the population are starving. White families and black Africans who supported the opposition Movement for Democratic Change have been murdered in considerable numbers. In many areas of the country women and young girls who supported the MDC have been raped by Mugabe's thugs. In the last few months there have been several cases where wives and daughters of white Zimbabweans have been raped. And still the West turns a blind eye. Britain and the EU continue to send Mugabe financial aid 'for humanitarian purposes' and it is now revealed in EU documents that more than £100 million of this has disappeared into the coffers of Mugabe and his closest allies (see Sunday Telegraph 06.03.04).

Meanwhile, across the Limpopo river in South Africa, President Mbeki has stood by Mugabe and opposed his expulsion from the Commonwealth. Mbeki and his ANC Government have also turned a blind eye to the murder of nearly one thousand white farmers, mainly Afrikaners, since he has been in power. This has received scant coverage in the UK press. However, this is nothing compared to a forecast of mass bloodshed of whites when Nelson Mandela, aged 85, dies. This came in a news report from WorldNetDaily.com, posted February 9, 2004, on Joseph Farah's G2 Bulletin.

The Bulletin says plans are being made by South Africa's Communist Party to slaughter all whites in the country upon Mandela's death. One of the operations planned entails 70,000 black men "being transported to Johannesburg city centre within an hour" in taxicabs to attack whites.

The plans are variously dubbed 'Operation Vula', 'Night of the Long Knives', 'Operation White Clean-up', and 'Red October campaign'. Sources say most blacks in the country are aware of the plans. When racial disputes occur, blacks often tell whites, "Wait until Mandela dies".

THE GATES OF HELL

Nick Griffin warns of troubled times ahead

"They have opened the gates of hell." This was the spine-chilling response of the Palestinian Hamas organisation to the March 22nd assassination of its spiritual leader, Sheikh Ahmed Yassi. The use of a helicopter gunship to obliterate a frail old man in a wheelchair - the man who founded what is not only the worst perpetrator of suicide bombings in Israel, but also probably the biggest social welfare organisation in Palestine - was instantly recognised as a massive escalation of the conflict there.

The citizens of Madrid, however, could be forgiven for believing that those same fiery gates had already been opened. The murder of 192 commuters by a gang of Moroccan fundamentalists brought home to Spaniards the full extent of the danger of backing America's dangerous adventure in Iraq.

The millions who poured onto the streets swung from anger against the Basque separatists who were initially blamed, to fury against the Government which had dragged their country into the firing line and then told cynical lies in a failed attempt to keep the public in the dark until after the general election a couple of days later.

SHAKEN

The Blair regime was clearly shaken by the Madrid Massacre or, more specifically, by the way in which ten bombs planted by a small cell of Islamic fundamentalists brought down a government which had backed the war in Iraq against the wishes of the vast majority of the electorate.

In an effort to avoid such a reaction taking place in Britain, New Labour politicians from Tony Blair upwards have since made great play of warning that it is now a question of "when, not if" similar atrocities take place in Britain. The aim is to establish a reputation for telling the unpleasant truth and for being prepared, and to imply that somehow such terrorism is inevitable, rather than a reaction to flawed foreign policy decisions.

Most of all, the "when not if" approach is designed to get us all used to the idea. It's being done in an attempt to lessen the shock when fifty years of dancing to someone else's Middle East tune - culminating in taking part in the occupation of Saudi Arabia and the invasion of Iraq - suddenly explodes in our national face and turns some defenceless English city into a passable imitation of Coventry in 1940.

Unfortunately for Blair and Co, in fact unfortunately for all of us, the real threat to life, limb and property in Britain isn't that first inevitable attack. It isn't even the second, or the third, unless - as we have already been warned - the new generation of al-Qa'eda terrorists really have managed to buy some of the suitcase-size battlefield nuclear bombs which are reported to have vanished in the ruins of the Soviet Union.

SET TO EXPLODE?

No! The real danger of mayhem is not from a repeat of the Madrid Massacre on the London Underground, it's from what could so easily follow as tensions which have been building up for years explode to the surface of Britain's hopelessly diverse and divided population.

To refer back to Coventry, when the Luftwaffe bombed the historic heart out of that city on 14th November 1940, everyone in the entire country knew who to blame for the deaths of 554 defenceless civilians: Hitler; Goering; the Nazis; Germany. Far from causing problems on the Home Front, the raid actually galvanised public opinion, leading to people rallying behind not just the government but also each other. If Hitler had wanted to unite the British people, he couldn't have done a better job than giving them that image of the charred ruins of Coventry Cathedral.

One day, incidentally, a BNP Government will restore Coventry Cathedral to its former glory, and flatten that neo-Marxist modernist monstrosity that was erected to replace it but that's another story for another, happier, time.

THE ENEMY WITHOUT

However much damage was done by bombs in that war, they were other peoples' bombs; bombs dropped by outsiders; bombs for which no-one living in Britain was likely to be blamed by the Man on the Clapham Omnibus as it skirted the craters and the wreckage of homes and lives.

This time, however, it's going to be very different. However big the bombs are, whatever the terrorists' targets, and however good their security, something will emerge about the individuals responsible. Whether it's CCTV footage or a few bits of a suicide bomber, or even just the rumours which rip through crowds besides themselves with grief and rage, something will convince the British people that this isn't just the work of foreign extremists.

Some of them will have got into our country as asylum seekers, various Muslim extremists will try to 'justify' the attacks. And from that day forth, millions of ordinary Brits will look at the Asian or Arab sat near them on the bus or driving past them in the street and think "Suicide Bomber." Once that sorry state of affairs is reached, major civil unrest - complete with mob violence, burnt-out houses and racial gang warfare - is inevitable. As Mr Blair would say, it's a question of when, not if.

This isn't just the BNP analysis of the danger. Look at what was said in The Observer, as far back as 4th November 2001. In a lengthy article headed "We will replace the Bible with the Koran in Britain," Paul Harris and Burhan Wazir wrote about the growing number of British-born Muslims leaving middle class homes in places like Luton and Crawley to go to fight for the Taliban. The threat of this development - since heightened by the emergence of Islamic suicide bombers as a major British export - to the future of the multi-racial experiment was explicitly spelled out:

"The nightmare scenario would involve British soldiers clashing with Muslim volunteers, which experts warn could spark a disastrous breakdown in race relations. 'The ripple effect upon social attitudes, community segregation and race gang fights would be enormous, especially as many white people can't tell who is a Muslim and who just has Asian or Middle Eastern appearance,' said Modood."

Ripple effect? If the prospect of British soldiers coming up against a few Tipton Taliban types could produce 'ripples', something like a bomb at Manchester United will unleash a tidal wave of trouble. All of a sudden, those opened Gates of Hell won't be half a world away.

The signs are already there. Scarcely a day goes by without us getting reports of yet another of those all too common cases where one or two local lads walking home in the evening are suddenly confronted by two or three carloads of young 'Asians', all tooled up with baseball bats and yelling anti-white obscenities as they beat their innocent victims to a pulp.

HUSHED UP

It's happening all over the country, from major cities down to quite small towns; from Cardiff to Stockton-on-Tees, from Portsmouth to Glasgow. The vast majority of these attacks never get further than the local paper, many of them are brushed under the carpet completely.

Invariably, the police and the media go to extraordinary lengths to give the impression that there is "no motive", even though the official police guidelines state that an attack is a racist attack if anyone, including not just the victims but also witnesses or even just members of the local community, believes it is a racist attack.

To Politically Correct police chiefs on the make, however, the stabbing of Stephen Lawrence by an unknown gang is a racist murder, whereas the abduction and torturing to death of 15-year-old Kriss Donald in Glasgow last month by a gang of Pollokshields Pakistanis is a senseless gang killing.

The media are just as self-serving and dishonest. In the case of any ordinary murder, every gruesome detail the papers can report is repeated ad nauseam by editors who know that gore sells papers. Yet, writing a full week afterwards, not one single Scottish paper, let alone any of the nationals, has printed the full story of this, one of the most brutal murders in recent British history.

The facts were out there within hours of his corpse being discovered dumped near Celtic's training ground: Despite his abductors knowing that he was only 15, and knowing that he couldn't possibly be the 'right' victim even if they were settling some gangland grudge, Kriss Donald was beaten on the evening he was kidnapped, held overnight in terror, then tortured for three hours, during which he was so badly beaten and mutilated that his broken and hacked body could only be identified by forensic scientists. Despite all that, he was still clinging to life when he was finally dumped on a piece of wasteland and stabbed to death.

SELF-CENSORSHIP

These are the facts, yet to get them you had to buy and read half-a-dozen Scottish newspapers. Every single one of them self-censored the full horror of Kriss Donald's final hours, just as their English counterparts are self-censoring the wave of near murderous anti-white racist attacks which are going on in places as diverse as Rochdale, Oldham, Dewsbury, Birmingham, East London and so on.

Nor have any of these fearless truth hounds reported on the race riots in schools in Stoke and the small West Yorkshire town of Mirfield, or on the tensions and hatreds simmering in West Midlands 6th Form colleges such as Dudley and Halesowen, where young Islamic extremists regularly throw their organised weight around against white, Sikh and black students alike.

Then there is the situation in Birmingham, where West Midlands Travel recently had to suspend bus services in wonderfully diverse Alum Rock after 8 p.m. at night, on account of the same sort of attacks on the vehicles and their drivers as are commonplace against fire crews in places like Bradford. Meanwhile, just down the road in once affluent and boringly mono-cultural Solihull, a gang calling itself the 'Lethal Paki Krew' (sic) has launched repeated racist attacks on local whites, including a serious assault on a seven-months pregnant woman.

PANIC MEASURES

It's not as if the Powers That Be don't know what's going on. On 21st March, John Stalker, the high-profile former Deputy Chief Constable of Greater Manchester Police warned that police forces ignoring the growth of gang 'culture' among ethnic groups "are doomed to take panic measures further down the line."

He went on to spell out just how serious things are already: "If left alone, gangs will keep pushing the system until they are stopped. You soon get the situation which exists in London, Birmingham and Manchester, where firearms are used to settle relatively minor matters. Where once they would have resulted in a punch-up, they are now being dealt with by a sub-machinegun."

If this was going to stay a matter of clashes between gangs, even gangs divided on ethnic lines, it really wouldn't matter - except to the occasional by-stander caught in the crossfire. To be blunt, these lowlives would do us all a favour by wiping each other out. But the trouble is, it won't stop there.

Perhaps the most worrying development of all in the last couple of months has been the rise to cult status among many young British Muslims of a well-produced 'music' video in which one 'Sheikh Terra' brandishes a handgun and a copy of the Koran while fusing gangsta rap and Islamic fundamentalism.

Entitled 'Dirty Kuffar' (i.e. 'Dirty Unbeliever') this shows scenes of conflict between Islamic militants and Western troops, tells viewers that Messrs Bush, Blair and your author should be 'thrown in de fire.' It finishes with gloating shots of the collapse of the Twin Towers, together with the exhortation for Believers to 'Prepare to Fight the Infidels'.

APPALLED

After watching this video, and hearing how it is so popular among disaffected Muslim youth (which is not to say the whole Muslim community, many of whom are appalled by their leaders' and the authorities' failure to get to grip with the fundamentalist cancer growing in their midst), one is forced to wonder whether at least some of the apparently random attacks on whites are in fact initiation ceremonies or training operations for groups which are preparing for such conflict?

Whether that is the case or not, it is a fact that if a mirror image of this incitement to mayhem and murder was being snapped up by crowds of young whites at big football matches, it would be headlines, and the authorities would quite rightly clamp down on the distributors before their slick and incendiary production led to an explosion of racist violence. But, of course, as Dirty Kuffar sets whites up as victims, not perpetrators, the Government, the police and the media (with the exception of The Observer, which broke the story of just how popular it has become) either don't give a damn or think that it will all go away if it is ignored.

But, as history and commonsense tell us, tensions like this don't go away. Either the authorities take resolute action to defuse such a time bomb before it goes off, or they leave it too late and the hatred and juvenile excitement explodes into naked violence.

When it does, of course, all the left-liberals, from Tony Blair to Michael Howard, from BBC pundits to police chiefs, will fall over themselves to blame the BNP. But - provided we respond responsibly, calmly and within the law at all times - it won't wash.

Years of their glowing enthusiasm for multi-culti diversity have marked the old gang's cards in the eyes of the public. And years of seeing the BNP messenger stoned for the crime of bringing bad news have established our credentials as the people who've been right all along.

CLASH

Several years ago, a small group of powerful 'neo-Conservatives' with immense influence in American and British politics decided - as a result of a mixture of Messianic politico-religious fantasy, ideology and the desire to win lucrative contracts for their friends in big business - that the USA should use its lone superpower status as the 'opportunity' to "reshape the Middle East". They predicted that this would involve a 'Clash of Civilisations' and set about turning that prediction into reality.

Unfortunately for us in Britain, our ruling elite have spent the last fifty years diversifying our own civilisation so that our formerly mono-cultural society now resembles nothing so closely as the Tower of Babel. Their Clash of Civilisations won't just bring blood, fire and death to the streets of Basra and Madrid. It is now all too likely to bring those selfsame horrors to a street near you.

This was the grim future which Enoch Powell saw dimly and darkly ahead when he talked of his forebodings about the river Tiber, flowing with much blood. It might start with bombs planted by a handful of fanatics, but it will end with our diversified towns and cities in a sea of fire; caused not by semtex but by mobs with petrol bombs. The Clash of Civilisations will be anything but civilised. It's no longer a matter of if; it's only a matter of when.

Indoctrination In Our Schools

YBNP member Sarah Cain delighted delegates at last year's RWB Festival with the delivery of her speech. Now, age 14, she passes on the content of this speech, slightly updated, to Identity readers

You may think that you know much about the brainwashing systems of today put into place by our left-wing Government and local councils. However you only have a brief idea, you know how it works on the TV and in the newspapers but you only hear what life is like in schools. Today I'm going to give you a much more thorough view from a 13 year old's perspective. I go to a Sheffield school that possesses extremely left-wing teachers. For instance our Humanities block is lead by an ANL activist! This is just an example.

Let's start on Monday morning. I will have an RE lesson in which the rest of my form and I are to be brainwashed about Hindu gods and mosques. Now although it may be interesting for some to learn the likes of your opponents, I do not wish to emigrate to India when I grow older and I have no wish for Britain to become India. Learning Christianity I would find to be more useful in a country such as England, don't you think? However it must hurt the multiculturalists to think that today's children weren't being brought up in a way that was favourable to their own kind!

SO-CALLED GEOGRAPHY LESSONS

In a geography lesson we are educated (or should I say indoctrinated in case we haven't the right thoughts) on how the Mexicans are crossing the border to America and how racist the Americans are to them. Please tell me what is so racist about protecting your own borders? What is so racist about saying "No! I don't want illegal immigrants working and doing slave labour for me"? Some Americans just like their country, so in other words they are patriotic (Oh look, another country in which political correctness goes over the top).

On this subject I want you to take a special note of the fact that geography is no longer "geography". Geography used to involve map reading, atlases and compasses. Now we learn about foreign politics, which correct me if I'm wrong, but they could change at any time so there is absolutely no obvious point to it.

When you were at school I have no doubt that you were taught where the countries were and where the great lakes are and what they are individually called. From my point I have never been taught where the European countries are, or for that matter any of the countries of the world

In an English lesson we are told to study stories that involve a multicultural society and to learn the aspects and benefits of living in one. How in any possible way could this be of help to me in a future life, as personally I think that there are far more disadvantages than any thing else, despite how much we are indoctrinated. Now when they say living in a "multicultural society" we must stop and think for a moment of the most obvious facts. We British do not live in a multicultural society. The truth is that the white population will remain in one part of the city while the black or Asian community will settle in the next. I can see this, even if Labour officials refuse to accept it and they pretend to be blind to the facts.

YOUNG PATRIOT: Sarah Cain

In a drama lesson we act out life as our teachers believe it to be. In a previous lesson a classmate has been made to act as a black teenager who is intelligent and very able, whereas another is made to act as the white girlfriend and to portray the benefits of a multicultural society. In our tutors' world all 'ethnics' are good, hard-working and honest people. None of them claim false benefits or have any dealings with drugs, any that are in prison or doing community service are there because they have been victimised due to their colour. It seems somehow impossible that a native British person can possibly be racially attacked.

DRUGS

Each evening I catch the bus home. There have been occasions where my mate and I have been offered weed; funnily enough this is not by one of my white classmates but one of the few 'ethnics' in the school that sell it.

This might shock or amaze you, you may think that this is fiction but I only wish it was. This school is not alone throughout the country, in fact it is one of the better schools from the drug aspect and I would be shocked and amazed if other white school children had not had the same experience as I have.

You are often given views of "school life" from the news media and from other left-wing organisations, yet you do not hear the stories from the actual school children, I hope this article helps to enlighten you and lets you view the modernised ways of teaching. The older generation, my father included, were taught much differently as his knowledge of the subjects named above are very different to mine. Sometimes it frustrates me that the present 'education' system has put such a gulf between us.

Are the modernised ways of teaching better or worse than the older methods? There's no doubt in my mind that my generation has been betrayed.

Revised Costs For the Euro Election Leaflets

When Tony Lecomber reported in the June 2003 issue of Identity on the sum needed to be raised by each region to cover the likely costs of producing a blanket coverage election address, he said that it was likely that the stated cost would go up. Any printing quote can only be held for a few weeks, and paper prices were expected to rise. He added that, nevertheless, we needed to have some figures so that we could at least aim at a target.

Since then the printer who gave us the quote last year has retired and the business was broken up at auction rather than sold as a going concern. This was particularly unfortunate since the printer concerned was very competitive.

As a result, new quotes have been obtained and the best price we have found has jumped by around 15%. In addition paper prices have risen as expected. The possibility has been raised (and rejected) that we source out our printing requirements to E. Europe, or even to Turkey as the so-called UK Independence Party is doing. Instead, says Tony, "we are putting our principles first and 'buying British'!"

In addition, some thought has gone in to how our election address should look given the increased costs. We need our election address to stand out and there is a feeling that moving to black and white but retaining gloss paper for the 2/3 A4 address will achieve lowered costs but keep it looking smart and different (Last May saw a number of very smart looking election addresses using just this format). The gloss paper makes any printing stand out.

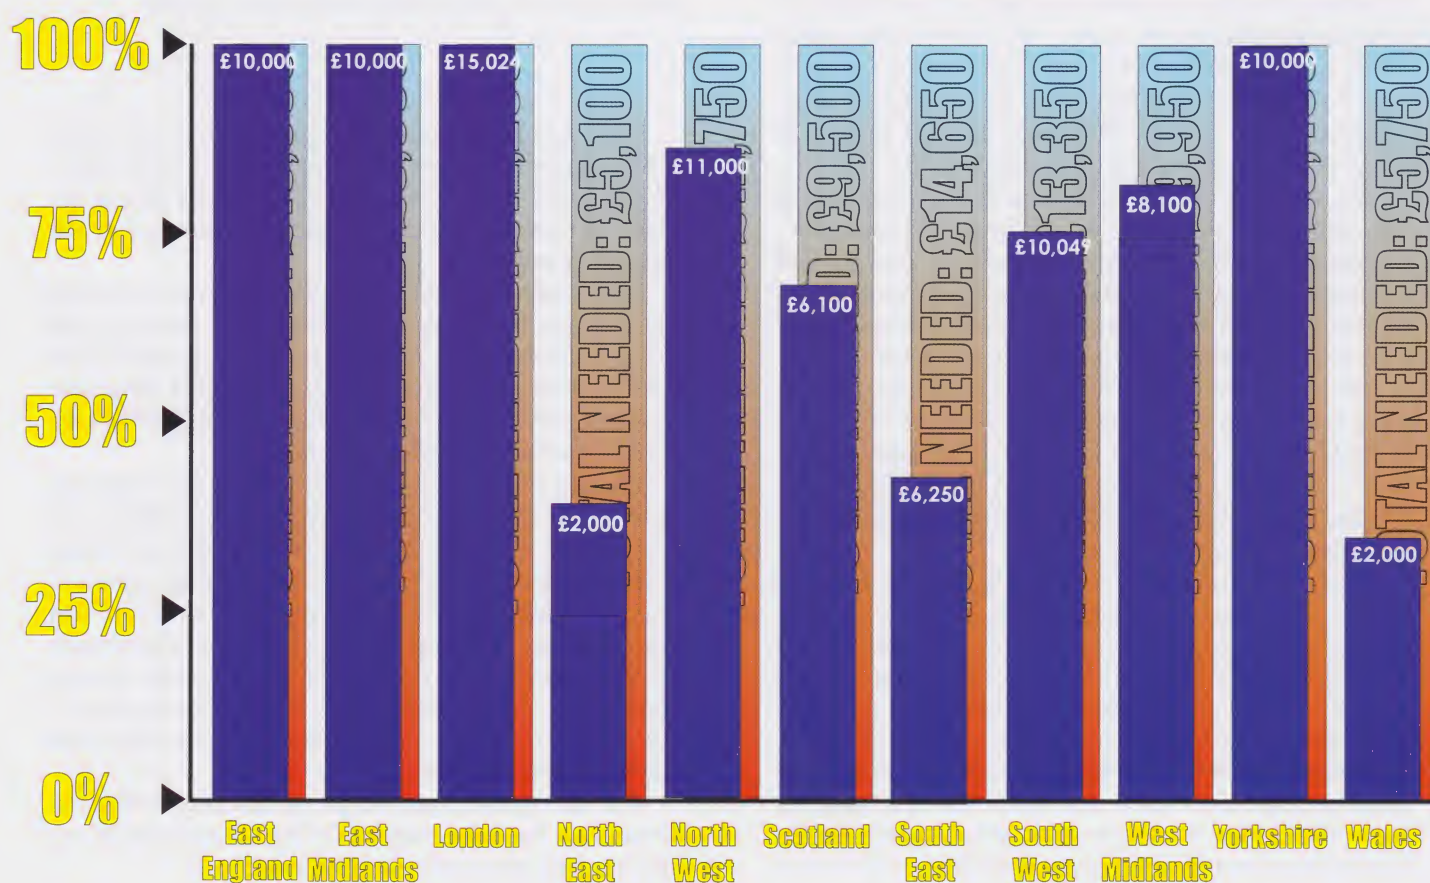

The minimum A5 election address (the size of our standard leaflets) is 2-side, 2-colour, gloss (as A5 is much less classy than 2/3 A4 folded, the A5 has been given another colour for only £1,000 across a possible 25 million!); the 2/3 A4 election address will be 1-colour, gloss, folded to 4-panel.

All quotes include the significant expense of banding into 100s and delivering to your sorting offices.

The bar chart below features the figures for the BASIC leaflet and shows how the regions are shaping up to meet that target. The totals needed for the upgraded 2/3 A4 election address are in the box below.

East England	£14,300
East Midlands	£11,000
London	£17,160
North East	£6,940
North West	£18,000
Scotland	£13,870
South East	£20,650
South West	£13,080
West Midlands	£13,940
Yorkshire	£13,140
Wales	£7,820

Now Let's Break All Records

£82,000! That's the fantastic sum raised for our Euro Election Appeal last month. Over thirty days the readers of Identity and other BNP members and supporters have contributed more than £2,700 every single day to the Cause of restoring Britain's freedoms and preserving our identity. This is a British Nationalist record of which we can all be very proud.

The magnificent month brings the total in the Fund to more than £170,000 just over 85% of the target figure that many people thought was unattainable.

And the money is still pouring in as pre-election excitement mounts and every day seems to bring more headlines that look as though they're straight from Freedom. Two more big collections held at the start of the month won't even show up until cheques are cleared and IOUs redeemed, but with £11,000 collected at the London rally on Saturday 3rd April and £5,000 (half of which will pay for local leaflets in one of our biggest pushes for council seats, leaving £2,500 for the Yorkshire Euro campaign) raised in Halifax the next day, we're set to break through the target within weeks.

So now comes the catch - as we said right from the start, £200,000 was the barest minimum with which we could even establish a nationwide presence in this campaign. So we're going to try to go one better. We've set ourselves a new target of a total of £250,000 - a quarter of a million pounds!

Yes, it's a lot of money, but it's still only a tiny fraction of what the other parties and our opponents are throwing into the campaign to keep us out. But with so many external factors moving in our favour, it's clear that the time is right now for this one extra big push.

The biggest project for which the BNP needs the extra money is so that the party centre can pay to upgrade all the leaflets of every region. Whether it's a full delivery of the basic A5 leaflet in areas which at present are still short, or paying to upgrade the basic leaflet to the larger two-thirds A4 address, or upgrading regions which reach that target to a full-sized six panel A4, that's what we want and need to do to maximise our chances of saving deposits and winning seats.

We have now heard from the Post Office that they are creating an unprecedented network of 2,000 delivery compliance officers, who will be checking that election literature does get delivered. Every home in mainland Britain is scheduled to receive a BNP leaflet we need to take this opportunity to make sure that those millions upon millions of leaflets are the best quality we can possibly afford.

A national opinion poll by YouGov, quoted in the Mail on Sunday on 4th April just found that 16% of all electors "are considering voting BNP". When you add in the very many people who will be considering it, but are afraid to admit to such politically incorrect thoughts to a stranger on the phone, the true figure must be even higher.

Of course, we must expect some of these people to lose their nerve as the anti-BNP campaign is cranked up to fever pitch over the coming weeks, but the potential clearly exists for a political earthquake.

But it's not a foregone conclusion. The difference between 16% and 6% is tiny just a bit more or less credibility, just a bit more or a bit less work. This is our biggest chance ever for a stunning breakthrough. Please dig deep once more and help us make June 10th 2004 the day that changes history and saves the land and people we all love.

James Marsden offers some thoughts for the BNP to consider on:

Interest and the Banking System

GORDON BROWN The man who is meant to be in charge of the economy

How is money generated? There are basically two ways. As most people in today's consumer society are aware, a great deal of money is generated by bank debt. We borrow money from the banks for our mortgages, personal loans and credit cards etc., and this money of course carries that devil called debt and interest. The other way involves the government creating its own money and introducing it into the economy, interest- and debt-free; i.e. money that is spent not lent.

These two ways are not equal. Whereas 97% of our money is created by the private banking system as debt -- money created due to the demand for credit -- only 3% is created by the government debt-free. As a consequence of virtually all our money coming into existence as a debt to the private banks, we see people, businesses and governments going into deeper debt each year and producing what is known as debt-slavery; which the BNP believes is a destructive state of affairs and demands change and reform.

I believe that more of our money should be injected into the economy by the government, increasing the proportion of government debt-free money produced. If there is confidence in this "new system", the project will be a success and so reduce the burden of debt-slavery. The government will thereby be able to produce the money to finance some of its expenditure, instead of relying solely on taxation and loans from the commercial banks. If the government has the authority to borrow money, it should also have the authority to issue its own notes and coins. The government already issues 3% of its own money debt-free, so why is it that this percentage cannot be increased? (This money is minted by the Bank of England on behalf of the government and sold to the banking system at face value, to facilitate the transactions that require physical money as opposed to the electronic kind).

One criticism of the above proposal is that the issuing of money by the government will inevitably lead to inflation. This might be true if the government started to pump out notes endlessly; but in our "sophisticated" and relatively stable economy, inflationary pressure can be properly managed. For example, the banks could be limited to the amount of credit cash they could produce by controlling the amount of income that can be duplicated for mortgage purposes, so limiting the value of mortgage money coming into the system. On top of this, the 'new system' should be introduced slowly, progressively and be highly monitored for specific purposes.

Another way inflationary pressures could be controlled if the Bank of England was to introduce debt free money into the economy, is by specifying a specific sum for a particular purpose. An amount of one per cent as expressed as a proportion of gross domestic product (GDP) could be minted debt and interest free and utilised for paying the interest on the outstanding national debt. If this 'new system' was acceptable to consumers and commerce and confidence was established, it could be expanded to facilitate a rise in the state pension.

EFFECT OF CREDIT CONTROLS

The credit controls mentioned above would also have an effect on today's housing market which needs stabilising due to high inflation in this sector. After the feeding frenzy is over and the dust has settled, the realisation will dawn that high house prices benefit no one in the end (except a few property speculators). Credit controls will hopefully stabilise the housing market. The concern is that there may be a melt down in the market and the spectre of negative equity may raise its head again. This phenomenon may be unavoidable and inevitable if the market decides that prices are unrealistic (the ghost of Thatcher still hovers over our roofs). There is something unnerving about a property system that precludes first time buyers from getting their feet on the first rung because of the expense, and also precludes people already in the chain from moving up the ladder because of the amounts involved. The recent rise in the interest rates by a quarter of one per cent to four per cent is a warning by the Bank of England that personal debt and mortgage debt are too high. However, this warning has come too late, as did the warnings concerning company pensions and endowment mortgages for this generation. The Government has once again failed in its duty of care to protect the electorate by not issuing suitable economic warnings at appropriate times.

At the time of writing, the Government has produced a bill which aims to alleviate some of the burden caused by failing pension schemes. This is welcome, but is just another example of the free-market, which only works if the Government does not end up on the wrong side of it. Another example would be George Bush's increasing protectionism. In the future, many plasters will be needed to cover the cuts caused by the free-market principle.

'REAL' MONEY IN YOUR WALLET

One important consequence of the 'new system' would be that the government would not need to rely so heavily on taxation and borrowing for its expenditure. This would hopefully result in a situation where a government could offer real income tax cuts, which would mean that consumers have more 'real' money in their wallets to pay for the goods and services that are demanded without going into debt. It is a strange situation that demands consumers to go into credit card and personal loan-debt to pay for the goods and services they desire. Our goal should be to place more money into our pockets for consumer spending.

In addition, with this new system it would no longer be acceptable for the government to claim that it does not have any money for social policies. It would be reasonable to say that this system would take many years to establish, but it is better than the debt-slavery we have at present.

STRANGLEHOLD OF THE BANKS

The present system of introducing money into the economy really only benefits the banking system. The banks are willing to create massive amounts of credit cash in return for interest, profits, a favourable stock market price and dividends for their shareholders. Who said that protectionism was a redundant economic concept! They are willing to protect their business even though this results in debt-slavery which is ultimately detrimental to the economy and individuals who find that they do not have any 'real' cash to spend but only debt-money. It would be very difficult to describe the stranglehold the banks have on our lives as democratic. Their version of democracy is really only valid as a means of protecting international financiers, who use the profits of big business to gamble on the roulette wheel of the stock and currency markets (and as many of our pensioners and endowment mortgage holders have realised, this gamble does not always pay off).

The feasibility of the 'new system' is borne out by past experience. In the 1950s and 60s the money stock consisted of only about 75% bank credit money and 25% cash currency created debt-free, due to the fact that there were more transactions requiring physical notes and coins. However, there has since been a declining use of physical money as compared to the electronic kind.

Why should the declining use of cash mean that the difference is made up by bank credit money and the debt it entails? Just because the economy needs less physical cash does not mean it needs more debt.

When a government does not have enough revenue from taxes to pay for its expenditure policies, it turns to the commercial banks. They in turn lend money to the government who give the banks IOUs. These IOUs state that the government will repay the debt after, say, ten years plus annual interest. These IOUs are technically called bonds. The significance of this procedure was noticed by Thomas Edison who said, "if our nation can issue a dollar bond, it can issue a dollar bill. The element that makes the bond good, makes the bill good" ('Notes and Coins', The New York Times 1921). And that element is the authority and confidence invested in our government.

With its overambitious spending plans, the present Government overstated the growth in gross domestic product (GDP), and now finds that tax revenues are not sufficient to pay for its expenditure programme. As a result, government borrowing has increased sharply. In the calendar year 2001, borrowing was £1 billion; in 2002, £17 billion; in 2003, £39 billion. If the amount of £30 billion is borrowed in 2004 as forecast, that would make a total borrowing figure of £87bn in just four years! The Government has filled this black hole with borrowed money, which is not good for the taxpayers as we are the ones who will ultimately have to pay the capital and interest. This situation is a black mark against the Chancellor's 'prudent' reputation.

In conclusion, not only does our credit money lubricate and sustain the economy, but we are also charged interest for the privilege. I would suggest that this is an unsatisfactory state of affairs according to the principles of the BNP, and would recommend that our Party advocates curtailing debt slavery by placing more 'real' money into the hands of the taxpayers and government, with the stated aim of producing a more contented and prosperous country.

EDDIE GEORGE: The head of the Bank of England and the man who controls British interest rates.

The New Colonialism and the Destruction of Britain: PART 3

The only answer to this onslaught is the BNP, says John Maddox in this concluding part of his article, for it is the right party at the right time

If we look back in history, the Anglo-Saxons faced a sustained period of aggressive immigration by the Vikings and associated Norsemen in the eighth and ninth centuries so that a large swathe of north-east England was settled by the Norsemen and became known as the Danelaw, where Danish law and customs held sway.

The Anglo-Saxons attempted to stem the growth of this canton and the raids launched from it by paying the famous 'Danegeld,' a tribute of a large sum of money to buy off the Danes - who, of course, since it was easy money, always came back for more.

Can you spot any similarities between then and the situation now where our aggressive multiculturalists are constantly launching 'raids' against the indigenous British, attempting to shame them, to pin back and legislate against our culture and to enforce increasingly large transfers of resources via the tax, benefits and grant aid systems to the new immigrant settlements?

Eventually, of course, Alfred the Great decided that enough was enough and militarily defeated the Danes, before facing them with a simple choice: stay but integrate, accepting Anglo-Saxon customs and law and converting to Christianity, or go! Large numbers stayed and peacefully integrated so that even today one can find the remnants of the old Danelaw in surnames and place names in the North East.

Let us hope we never again face a situation of military conflict within the UK. But, as the 'international community' struggles with militant and terrorist Islam (of which, more in a moment), we are in danger of finding ourselves in a situation where relations between the races and religions worsen and those areas in which the multiculturalists have encouraged immigrant communities to become mono-racial effectively become colonies and no-go areas for other races and religions.

As we know, although this fact is virtually censored by the Government and our mass media, there are already no-go areas for the indigenous British in their own homeland - parts of London, Birmingham, Bradford, Glasgow, etc. And these no-go areas apply not only to the British: I doubt if many Hindus or Sikhs would wish to wander into certain neighbourhoods either.

TERRORISM AND ISLAM

The major and internationally destabilising force which is upsetting all the multiculturalists' plans to surreptitiously impose the remaking of this country on the indigenous British is, of course, militant and terrorist Islam. The multicultural fascists who now control all the commanding heights of our society will perform contortions rather than admit what the British public can see for itself - that most of the wars and the vast majority of terrorism currently afflicting the globe are Muslim-instigated. This is a fact which censorship cannot hide. This does not mean that the large majority of individual Muslims are extremists. They do not have to be because, unfortunately, Islam has always been a religion dominated by ideologically-motivated elites who have browbeaten and terrorized their own people into supporting or tolerating their activities: the idea of democratic rule being completely alien to the fundamental principles of Islam.

We need only recall that during the recent war in Afghanistan, opinion polls revealed that up to eighty per cent of 'British' Muslims gave tacit to the Taliban and were therefore against the British forces fighting there. And as we now know, there is an increasing stream of so-called 'British' Muslims who have taken up arms against their host country. So much for our 'community of communities'!

As international Islamic terrorism proliferates (and we have had several authoritative warnings now from our own police and security services - particularly after the Madrid massacre - that it is a matter of when there is a major Islamic terror attack in the UK, not if), we may find that states, however unwillingly (and however much of a volte-face it will be for David Blunkett in view of his recent infamous statement that there is 'no obvious upper limit' to immigration), will tighten their borders and adopt immigration controls which hitherto they would have regarded as unthinkable. Already the USA is putting in place an alien control system whereby any person who appears to be of Middle Eastern origin is treated with suspicion until proved innocuous. Such tight controls may eventually choke off the constant stream of new immigrants arriving in the UK and on whom the multiculturalists have been relying to complete their re-invention of Britain.

Of course, it will depend on our relationship with the EU at that time whether Brussels would allow individual states (particularly those like Britain targeted by the Brussels apparatchiks for further immigration) to take such unilateral action. But that would merely be a further reason for a precipitate exit from the EU, if one were needed. But even if our ruling elite finally plucked up the courage to put an end to this new phase of primary immigration, we would still be left with the problem of the immigrant settlements already here. Many of these immigrant communities harbour a significant minority of Islamic extremists and have been encouraged by the multicultural establishment to cling to their national and religious identities and to regard themselves as anything but British. Perhaps, in the fight against terrorism, the state may decide it is necessary again, very unwillingly to develop greatly the citizenship programme which David Blunkett is working on for all new arrivals in this country, extending it to the established immigrant settlements. However, since any citizenship programme likely to be acceptable to the multicultural thought police would merely be a history-, value- and belief-free 'citizens' advice' course, more concerned with how to claim benefits than what it means to be British, it is unlikely to have much success in locking immigrant communities into a belated loyalty to such hollowed-out ideas of 'Britishness'.

More promisingly, whilst all this is going on, the British people under the impact of the 'fruits' of multiculturalism and the growing international Islamic terrorist menace, will be rapidly coming to their senses and seeking a political expression for our outrage at what has been done to them.

Since the indigenous British are, by and large, a moderate and commonsensical people, they will seek a sensible, well-balanced party with an honest analysis of what has gone wrong and well-thought-out, feasible policies to put things right. And I hope they will find their requirements embodied in a greatly expanded and intellectually rigorous British National Party which will then have the chance to grow exponentially and become a major political and parliamentary force.

POLITICAL REPRESSION

What might happen at that stage? It may be that the British ruling elite, urged on by the multicultural hardliners and elements within the ethnic settlements (and in the context of an international situation made permanently unstable by Islamic militancy) will actually attempt to ban the BNP and any similar manifestation of resistance or resurgence on the part of the oppressed indigenous British, rather as the bankrupt and morally exhausted Communist regimes of Eastern Europe attempted to silence their own people at the time of the fall of Communism.

Just as in the 1980s, such a fundamental suspension of the basic liberties of free speech and free association would be met, I hope, by widespread civil protest. This might then have the effect of forcing the large constituency of the uncommitted and the timid to take sides and so bring about a realignment of political forces. Our governing elite would have to go along with this at some stage or risk losing control of the process and being jettisoned as irrelevant to the future of the British people. This would offer a vindicated and greatly strengthened BNP the opportunity of operating in an entirely new political landscape, identified as the primary, perhaps the only, party of indigenous British interests.

Of course, rather than attempting to stamp out the BNP, the old and

Asif Mohammed Hanif (right), a British citizen who killed himself and three others in a suicide bomb in Tel Aviv. Omar Khan Sharif (left), his accomplice whose bomb failed to detonate brain-dead political parties may decide instead to 'steal its clothes', so hoping to render it irrelevant. To a tiny extent, this is what New Labour is already attempting to do and since we know from its previous ideological contortions that New Labour is a party of no principles and no core values except the monopolisation of power by whatever means, it is perhaps not impossible to imagine it adopting wholesale, policies which until recently it has regarded as repugnant.

POLITICAL THIEVES

We need to remember that the current Labour Party emphasis on internationalism and minority rights have often coexisted uneasily within the party with other emphases on patriotism and the sectional interests of the British working class. We know that many in the Labour Party only tolerate Tony Blair and the New Labour clique because they have won two general elections.

When the great defining moment approaches as to whether Labour is to become the party of the burgeoning minorities or cling to its historic role as representative of the indigenous working class, it is conceivable that a more 'conservative' Labour Party will re-emerge, more openly committed to old style municipal socialism but a socialism centred on the interests of British workers as opposed to internationalist ideology. Historically, such a municipal socialism often had a robust attitude to 'foreigners' so it is not impossible that such a Labour Party could resurface to challenge or even hijack the BNP's policies.

Similarly, the Conservative Party is now entering new territory with Michael Howard as leader. He comes with a mixed track record but also with a reputation for making the right hard-line noises in the spheres of criminal and social policy. Despite his much trumpeted conversion to more 'inclusive' and user-friendly ways, it is not inconceivable that he, too, scenting political advantage, may return to much more traditional policies designed to appeal to increasingly frightened and beleaguered Tories in the shires and suburbs. Time will tell.

Studying the front-bench teams of the three major parties (I'm afraid I could not bring myself to discuss the Liberal Democrats - the most despicable and blatantly dishonest party in British politics today!) and, more importantly, their lack of reserve talent on the back benches and in the constituency associations, it is obvious that they are committed to an outdated political, social and cultural world view (fatally shot through with the fake ideology of multiculturalism, 'diversity' and minority rights) which has shaped their political lives and which, so late in the day, they are unlikely ever to be able to escape.

BNP: RIGHT PARTY, RIGHT TIME

Which leaves us with a final option: that the BNP will indeed make its big breakthrough - radical times demanding radical but sensible solutions - and become a dominant political and parliamentary player, either by itself or in some sort of coalition with breakaway elements of the other parties.

If this happens, the BNP will only have a continually receding window of opportunity to buttress the indigenous British and restore self-belief and confidence to the British body politic and society, due to the high immigrant and low indigenous birth rates. This will be the case even if mass immigration has been choked off. A major reason why the multiculturalists will keep up mass immigration for as long as possible is, of course, to maximise their chance of so fundamentally altering the composition of the inhabitants of the British Isles that the BNP will be permanently reduced to the status of mere representative of the British minority which will always be outvoted and outflanked by a coalition of other minorities.

So with this one golden opportunity, the BNP, whether it be in office at the national, regional or local level, will need the very highest standards of political analysis and practical administration as, whilst respecting the basic rights of the substantial immigrant communities living in Britain, in accordance with the statement of the United Nations Covenant on Civil and Political Rights that 'all peoples have the right of self-determination [and] to freely determine their political, social and cultural development', it swings the balance of public policy back towards the indigenous British population and the re-invigoration of its political, social and cultural life, so that any who come to these islands know that they do so on the basis of explicitly accepting British values, standards and belief systems, and not - as the multiculturalists would have it - the British accepting theirs.

LOOKING OVERSEAS

The example of Fiji may be relevant here. Over many years, Fiji a sizable island in the South Pacific with a population of 868,000, underwent large-scale Indian immigration until eventually the indigenous Fijians numbered only fifty-one per cent of the population. The Indians, with their well-developed business and trading skills, assumed a powerful and expanding role in the Fijian economy and political system. The indigenous Fijian society and culture began to unravel under the strain and racial tensions grew. Eventually, in 2000, George Speight, a Fijian businessman, led an armed coup after an Indian prime minister was appointed for the first time. The Prime Minister was held hostage by the forces of George Speight for two months, with the Fijian police and army refusing to move against him.

Eventually, to accommodate the fears of the indigenous Fijians, it was agreed to work towards a new constitution that guaranteed entrenched rights and representation for the Fijians. And so matters rest.

Of course, this solution, embedding the rights of an indigenous population, caused howls of outrage amongst multiculturalists worldwide, worried that other threatened indigenous populations might react similarly against the plans of the international multicultural ideologues particularly well-entrenched in the various agencies of the UN to foster multicultural 'ideal societies', having first encouraged multiracial problems by deliberately abetting the mass migration of populations

HUMAN RIGHTS?

I most certainly do not advocate any violence or any sort of insurrection in the UK, but the Fijian approach of enshrining the rights of an indigenous population in the basic law of a country is interesting and may be relevant to the predicament of the indigenous British population in the UK. Of course, New Labour's single most iniquitous legacy to the British people - its Human Rights Act - will have to be repealed or amended, whatever international uproar this occasions, because it renders it impossible for the majority to ensure that our legitimate interests, with due safeguards, have precedence over those of minorities or even individuals.

What will be involved in this reinvigoration of the British people? Certainly, a whole tranche of policies designed to destroy the sapping moral relativism prevalent in the UK since the disastrous transvaluation of values in the 1960s, as seen, for instance, in the rise of militant feminism and the even more militant 'gay rights' culture.

It is this moral relativism, linked to the deliberate attack by our intellectual elites on Christianity as the historic religion of the British Isles (aided, ironically, by Christianity's own self-mutation from a religion based on objective truth into a secularised campaigning body for special interest groups which has alienated most of its natural constituency), which underpins the destructive ideology of 'human rights' and its close sibling, multiculturalism.

In practical terms, these policies will include the introduction of sound education which teaches a full, undistorted and proud picture of British history, institutions and culture (recently, John Gummer, the Tory ex-minister, pointed out that, due to the iniquities of our politically correct national curriculum, young people can complete their entire education in British schools without having learned anything about their country's history and achievements before the First World War); social, tax and benefit policies which prioritise marriage, discourage abortion and produce a healthy indigenous birth rate; firm law and order policies which re-establish the concepts of 'right', 'wrong' and 'personal responsibility' and which ensure that the culpable are properly punished; economic policies which free the entrepreneurial abilities of the British people and which pin back state control and the culture of regulation and diktat; and summary reform of the European Union to transform it into a voluntary trading bloc or our equally summary withdrawal from it.

Most important of all, we will establish underlying guiding principles which accept (in today's jargon 'celebrate') the fact that mankind is divided into races and nations (whether that division stems from genetic or deep-rooted cultural differences is irrelevant), most of them with their own homeland, and that these races and nations have the right to celebrate themselves, to be secure in their own homelands, and to invest in the future of their own societies and cultures.

In other words, we need to reinstate the rough and ready common sense which served our predecessors reasonably well before the multiculturalists came along.

THE FUTURE: NOT LONG NOW!

And at this point we reach a horizon beyond which we cannot at the moment peer. The BNP will have its work cut out getting this far against ferocious opposition. If this stage were to be reached, new possibilities and problems, new political and social issues both national and international would arise, for history and politics are a constantly moving tide. But at least the British people would be well placed to face these new challenges rather than being swept aside and destroyed by a tidal wave of mass settlement.

And so the ultimate irony of the wilful, destructive social engineering of the multiculturalists is revealed: that in promoting and enforcing their new colonialism against the British people they will create the very conditions which will ultimately lead to their downfall and the triumph of the one political party they loathe above all others. Step forward the British National Party, the hand of destiny beckons.

George Speight

The Housing Scandal

Paul Flavelle gives some ideas for tackling Britain's housing problem

'Redevelopment' was the word used by Labour and Conservative in the 60s to herald the dawn of a new age in British housing. In reality it was the harbinger of a living nightmare that would condemn millions to hell-on-earth.

Redevelopment took the form of literally bulldozing away the once familiar terraced housing and smashing the communities they had held together through war and peace for generations. Within these communities there was a sense of belonging, of being bound together by common social and cultural ties. It was more than mere bricks and mortar. It was where you grew up: it was your roots.

To Labour/Conservative, however, the feelings of ordinary people were, and are, of little or no consequence and could never be allowed to stand in the way of their grandiose plans. Houses, streets, trees, pubs, churches, potting sheds, corner shops, and just familiar sights that give people that hard to define sense of security. All were crushed, burnt, bulldozed and destroyed. Out of the destructive fog of redevelopment emerged a cheap, plastic, violent and soon to become filthy replacement.

Not everyone was willing to submit tamely. Many tried to stay in their homes in open defiance of Labour/Conservative wishes, in which case a Compulsory Purchase Order would be served (get out or be thrown out). People could be swindled out of proper payment for their homes as houses condemned to destruction lost all value except 'land value'. The old politicians could order thousands out of entire communities, raze their homes to the ground, then use the levelled sites as improvised car parks until land prices rose sufficiently to give them a nice profit. The familiar story: they gain, you lose.

THIRD WORLD REPLICAS

The hell holes that replaced the destroyed communities speak for themselves. Council estates, tower blocks, inner city areas, have become by-words for replicas of the Third World; drugs, glue-sniffing, burglary, mugging, car-crime, noise, boarded-up graffiti-smearred buildings, burnt-out wrecks of stolen cars, ugliness, litter, violence and fear. This, and much more, is a testament to the achievements of the Labour-Liberal-Conservative politicians and the evil of decay they represent.

Today, these same political parties still cling to power. They are flooding our country with immigrants arriving under the guise of 'asylum seekers' and 'refugees'. They push these immigrants to the top of the housing lists, give them preferential treatment in all areas (thereby ensuring their votes) whilst our own British people are brushed aside.

Many Lib-Lab-Con councillors have been convicted over the years for taking bribes from property speculators who propose get-rich-quick schemes for building luxury flats for the rich, or allowing controversial buildings to be erected against the wishes of local people, or destroying landmarks that residents wanted preserved. The one thing the old gang politicians never and never will do, is to build decent, safe and affordable housing where our own people can live lives worth living.

WHAT SHOULD THE BNP DO?

I would like these following ideas to be considered by the Party.

1. Use both public and private funding for a vast new housing programme to re-establish community based housing projects. Sink estates, tower blocks and all similar monuments to Lib-Lab-Cons should be bulldozed into oblivion. The replacement new housing must be affordable, have a garden and a measure of privacy.
2. There should be further development of community facilities, local schools, shops, pubs, community centres, children's play areas and nurseries. Trees and shrubbery to be planted where possible.
3. Duties should be imposed on local government to be given to local government requiring them to take action to evict persistent trouble makers, drug offenders and other anti-social elements. A good working relationship between local tenants' committees and the police would pay dividends here.
4. A complete end to further immigration to relieve the increasing pressure on housing demand. Introduction of the BNP's voluntary resettlement policy.

5. As part of the BNP's proposed law & order policies, let it be known these would include the death penalty for repeat offender drug pushers and stricter punishment for thugs, vandals and hooligans.
6. Provide increased government funding for home improvements grants for low income families.
7. Provide help for first time buyers by extending tax relief to give lower monthly repayments at the start of their mortgages. A large slice of the funds required for the above could be paid for out of the money presently lavished on 'asylum seekers'.

OBITUARY: Tim Brown

On Thursday the 5th of February 2003 at the age of sixty-one, Tim Brown died of cancer in St Anne's Hospice in Little Hulton, Greater Manchester. Tim had been a supporter of, and worker for, our nationalist cause since the early 1970s.

Tim was a man of above average abilities and experiences. His keen intelligence compelled him to forcefully rebuke, with detailed argument, many people's misapprehensions as to the nature of the world we live in. This aspect of his character led to many people finding him abrasive. The son of a foundry worker he was raised in the tough conditions of working class Salford in the nineteen forties and fifties. He joined the merchant navy as a galley hand at the age of fifteen and by his mid-thirties had risen to be a chief purser on deep-sea ships, the third most important crew member after the captain and chief engineer. After the demise of our merchant fleet he moved on to work for United Arab Shipping and then took employment in Britain's North Sea oil and gas fields.

Though his life was prematurely cut off, Tim achieved more than most people. He travelled on all the seas and oceans of our world and on every continent including Antarctica. His work frequently took him to the former communist states where he witnessed and reported on the abject failure of Marxian socialism.

Travel and history were two of Tim's passions. He was a keen and formidably knowledgeable student of British history with which he closely identified. On his holidays he would frequently combine these two passions by touring, in his camper van, the old battlefields of Europe and America.

Tim was a man of both courage and conviction. During the twelve months preceding his death he carefully hid his illness from everyone, continuing his life as normally as was possible and never complaining or asking for sympathy. Even though he knew he was terminally ill and even though his doctors had told him that he would die in February 2004 he continued to work for the British National Party. He helped Stockport members to leaflet their town. In the summer of 2003 he helped to leaflet and canvass in Ellesmere port, in August 2003 he joined other Stockport members helping with the election campaign in Heckmondwike and in November 2003, though now visibly weak, he turned out to help the British National Party in the Failsforth council by-election.

Tim will be sorely missed by all who knew him.
He will not be forgotten.

John Bean's Nationalist Notebook

Say "No" to the EU

The proposed EU Constitution, which has been on the 'back boiler' for the last six months, is now being pushed forward again by the mainly unelected Brussels 'mafia' of unaccountable bureaucrats.

In desperation that this may be his 'last chance to book his place as a future president of Europe', Tony Blair seeks a quick deal on the constitution without the British people being able to vote on the issue. He says that there is no need to grant us a referendum because the European Constitution is only a tidying-up exercise. Of all his lies, this is the biggest lie of all. It is the greatest single threat to our traditional freedoms since World War Two. True Parliamentary democracy, as well as the monarchy, is threatened with extinction.

From the purely economic point of view, over the ten-year period 1993-2002, the UK's net contribution to EU institutions was over £4 billion a year and now rising. For that, we could have had a hundred and sixty 800-bed hospitals!

Voters need to know by the June 10th Euro Elections that unlike the Conservatives who still want us to be in the EU, and unlike the Lib Dems who would have had us bound hands and feet within it long ago, the BNP has consistently said "No to the EU". Co-operation with the independent national states of Europe, by all means.

Will Christians Fight Back?

Lord Carey, the former Archbishop of Canterbury, is to be commended for his realism in pointing out last month that Islamic culture is authoritarian, inflexible and has contributed no great invention for several hundred years. It is a pity he did not make his trenchant remarks when he was a soporific Archbishop.

You don't have to be a practising Christian, or even a nominal Christian, to be a member of the BNP. Some members are agnostic, some are atheists, some are pagans, but probably a majority are nominal Protestant or Roman Catholic Christians.

As the Party does not wish one's religious allegiance to be a barrier to political support it is strictly secular and will remain so.

Speaking personally, and not for the BNP, I view the left-wing Institute for Public Policy Research report urging the teaching of atheism in schools to be indicative of the fact that the anti-Christian forces in Britain have nearly won their battle. In essence, the report gives further encouragement to school children to question their Christian faith. Can you imagine a 'modernist' schoolteacher trying to explain to a Muslim father why his child should investigate atheism? But this would not happen, because the objective of the report, as is the ban on prayers at graduation ceremonies at Edinburgh and other universities, is anti-Christian rather than anti-religious.

The Christian Church is in disarray, with fragmentation looking likely over the campaigns for women bishops and support for homosexual 'marriages'.

It seems that all Christian denominations throughout Europe have forgotten the meaning of fidei defensor (no doubt too militant) and completely embraced the teaching that the meek shall inherit the earth. Be assured, the fundamentalists among Europe's growing Muslim community have fully noted this 21st Century Christian mindset.

Globalism: The Ultimate Alienation

I first knew Alastair Harper forty years ago, when we were both members of the Northern League, a non-political organisation for the preservation of North European historic cultures. I wrote to him in 2001 when I saw that he was standing as the UKIP candidate for Dunfermline West, politely informing him that he was wasting his time and should be standing for the British National Party. Well, that is just what he is doing on June 10th when he will be one of the BNP candidates in Scotland for the Euro elections.

As his 'reward'(!) I must quote the excellent letter he had published in the February 2004 issue of Sovereignty, an independent journal opposing British membership of the EU (286 Bath Street, Glasgow G2 4JR).

"Globalism is the final act in the opera of capitalism. In its fearful growth it has disposed of the varied, balancing element of earlier cultures and societies and left but the economic determinant.

"The Marxian dream of economic man is fulfilled. Capitalism versus Communism was but shadow boxing.

"Like cancer, global capitalism has gobbled up all the discrete tissues of our historic society in pursuit of its aggressive monopolistic being. Individual humans are now perceived as consumer units; values have gone, and only prices remain.

"The vastness and uniformity of the globalist spread resembles the latifundia (huge estates worked by slaves - Ed) which characterised the agronomy of latter day Rome, with its attendant urban, proletarian society. With the toppling of this house of cards, the barbaric invasions brought down Hellenic civilisation.

"Capitalist Theory, formally enunciated by Adam Smith in the Scottish Enlightenment, separated the individual from the Civitas Dei.

"Now in the final flush of capitalism, the individual is being separated from his kin, his national identity and from the community of the family itself. This is the ultimate alienation."

Lecherous Labour Boozers Bully 'Blair Babes'

Labour MP Jane Griffiths, once a New Labour star who epitomised the 'Blair babe' generation of woman MPs who won seats in 1997, has accused many of her male colleagues of supporting a culture of sexual infidelity and blind drunkenness at Westminster.

Ms Griffiths, 49, was deselected by her Reading East party last month after what she claimed was a concerted campaign of bullying against her in Westminster and Reading. She added that she had been sexually assaulted by a Labour MP a few years back and other MPs are having affairs with their secretaries.

She claimed that she knew of at least two senior ministers who had cheated on their wives (and we know of two former Ministers who like to view paedophile websites, but unfortunately we can't name them).

The candidate chosen to replace her in Reading East is Tony Page, who has two convictions for gross indecency in public lavatories. Perhaps he was following in the footsteps (not necessarily on Clapham Common) of Ron Davies, Labour's former Welsh Secretary.

As the June election campaign heats up the old parties' dirty tricks departments will be supplying media hacks with stories of BNP 'criminal acts' in order to frighten off our voters. I will stick my neck out in saying they will not be able to find many, if any, of the cases of sexual infidelities and perversions that plague the old parties. Yes, we must admit that we had one 21-year-old Councillor (his Branch never thought he would be elected) who was involved in a drunken brawl before we expelled him, but BNP 'crimes' are mainly past ones of football hooliganism by some when they were teenagers, or jail sentences incurred when some of us had to fight off onslaughts by vicious left-wing opponents in those early days.

UKIP's PR Man Acts For The 'Tipton Boys'

The prominent PR consultant Max Clifford is involved in a bidding war among book publishers for the 'memoirs' of the five Muslim 'Britons' freed from American custody in Guantanamo Bay. The five suspected terrorists' solicitor, Louise Christian (also a parliamentary candidate for the far-left Socialist Alliance) was involved in a squabble with Clifford over who had the right to represent some of the 'five'.

Tarek Dergoul from Hackney, East London, claimed to have been mistreated by the Americans. Max Clifford let it be known that his story would cost at least £200,000 for a newspaper to buy it and that Ms Christian's views were irrelevant. "I am representing him. She doesn't know of my contacts with the family."

A literary agent has said that their stories could be worth £100,000 each and the three from Tipton together could be worth £1m, with possible film rights. (See also our News item on page two).

How do UKIP members feel over the fact that their party officials are paying Max Clifford several thousand pounds to be their publicity agent for the forthcoming Euro election?

Even Liberals Have Doubts On Multiculturalism

As immigration climbs up the voters' list of important issues, now almost equal to the NHS and education, we even have prominent members of the liberal elite giving up their support for a multicultural Britain. Typical is Professor Robert Putnam, one of Blair's favourite gurus, who was welcome in Downing Street three years ago to back up Labour's vision of 'active communities'. He has now warned that: "Multiculturalism tends to lead to weaker communities". The Harvard academic also says that latest research in the U.S. reveals that people in racially-mixed areas show lower levels of trust and support to newcomers from other areas than to their own kind.

In The Guardian, hitherto completely given over to spreading the multi-culti gospel, the Witchfinder General of racism, Trevor Philips, has expressed great disappointment that "nice people do racism too". Apparently what particularly upset him was an article in The Observer by David Goodhart, editor of Prospect magazine and a self-confessed "sensitive member of the liberal elite". In the article he argued that cultural diversity and mass immigration can undermine the moral consensus on which a large welfare state rests. "You can have a (generous) welfare state provided that you are a homogenous society with intensely shared values."

Support From Mensa

For too long the liberal establishment have been allowed to get away with the implication that to be a member of Mensa, the non-political organisation for people with an IQ of over 150, you must be liberal minded. It was refreshing, therefore, to see that the old parties' open door immigration policy (they differ only in how far the door should be open) gets a good grilling from Gordon Haines writing in the March issue of Mensa Magazine. In advocating a "zero immigration" policy, he argues that the three reasons - economic, cultural and humanitarian - put forward by pro-immigration advocates are all fundamentally flawed.

"We have been told since the war that we need immigrants for economic reasons. This is even further from the truth now than it was then. The argument runs that with an aging population we need able-bodied workers. . . . we could add millions of productive workers by simply raising the retiring age." He adds that the real reason why powerful forces advocate immigration is because it is a source of cheap labour! He dismisses the concept of a multiculturalism as being an oxymoron. "The basis of a society is a common culture".

On 'refugees', Mr Haines says: "We owe no duty to economic migrants which obliges us to admit them to our disadvantage, and admitting the genuine refugee is to make the world a worse place by giving support to the tyrannies from which they are fleeing."

Incidentally, a few years back I took an official, supervised Mensa test and apparently had a score of 146. I was offered a 'free go' if I went down to London, but thought the 146 was probably a fluke result, unlikely to be repeated. I mention this not solely out of vanity and I am allowed a touch at my age, but merely to show the opposition that not all we BNP 'thugs' are cerebrally challenged.

LETTER OF THE MONTH

>> Time to Come Out of the Closet!

I'm just an ordinary mum who has recently joined the BNP. Some members of my family and friends have followed my lead and there are more to follow!

It's time to 'come out of the closet' and spread the word. When you put your head above the parapet it is comforting to discover that more and more people feel like us and are willing to join and eager to vote BNP.

The BNP is often demonised and gagged by the media to a great degree, so it is not always easy to get our true voice heard. My local Halifax area newspaper, The Evening Courier, claims to be the voice of Calderdale, when in fact it only ever seems to promote letters and articles supporting Conservative, Labour or Lib Dem. It colludes with those attempting to brainwash its readers with Politically Correct rhetoric. Do the editorial staff really think that if they ignore the BNP it will go away?

Our support is growing and rather than sitting back I want to buy leaflets and Freedom and deliver them myself. It's time more of us did our bit. My grandfather was shot and gassed (yet survived) at Ypres in the 1st World War (maybe that is where my fighting spirit comes from). I am utterly determined to carry on his fight to save our country.

So here is a message to the Tories: I used to vote for you! To Labour and the Lib Dems I say wake up and smell the coffee. This is the new breed of BNP, a 30-something mum, intelligent and articulate, willing not only to vote BNP but to join the party, fund-raise and spread the word.

>> I Was Saving For A Holiday...

I would like to donate as much as I can to your Euro Election Fund appeal. I was saving for a holiday, but the future of Britain is more important than that. I will send more when I have the available funds.

I recall that in one of the Party newsletters earlier this year it said we have somewhere in the region of 10,000 members. If each member donated as little as £20 we would achieve your minimum target of £200,000. Surely everyone can afford at least £20 or more.

I understand that you are now receiving the funds for the North East. Along with my £400 I hope to donate another £850 by end of April.

Note: As a family member our household currently receives two copies of the British Nationalist members' newsletter in separate envelopes. If you were to send one bulletin to each household where family members reside you could save on general running costs.

>> Christians Can Support the BNP

The lead story on the cover page of the March edition of Reform, published by the United Reformed Church, is devoted to 'Racism and the Gospel'. It comprises a vicious attack on the BNP, urging that: "In all of our churches it needs to be made clear that voting BNP is incompatible with the Christian gospel and we must encourage people to turn out and vote for legitimate (sic) candidates."

I have sent them a letter of 'correction'. However, I suggest that the time has come for the BNP to organise its Christian membership to refute such outrageous slurs. A sizeable percentage of what is left of the Christian community in this country is composed of inherently conservative people, who should by nature be automatic BNP supporters. To allow liberal-left propaganda to go unchallenged in this area is to lose unnecessarily many potential voters.

>> Cacophony of The Red Dawn Chorus

As the BNP steps up its campaign in the Euro elections, the local and London Assembly elections we begin to hear the cacophony of the 'Red' dawn chorus, all singing in unison from their perches high up in the political and 'cultural' establishments. The inter-species rivalries seem to stop as they unite against the common enemy - the BNP.

There is little as poisonous as the self-styled town hall dictators elected through the democratic

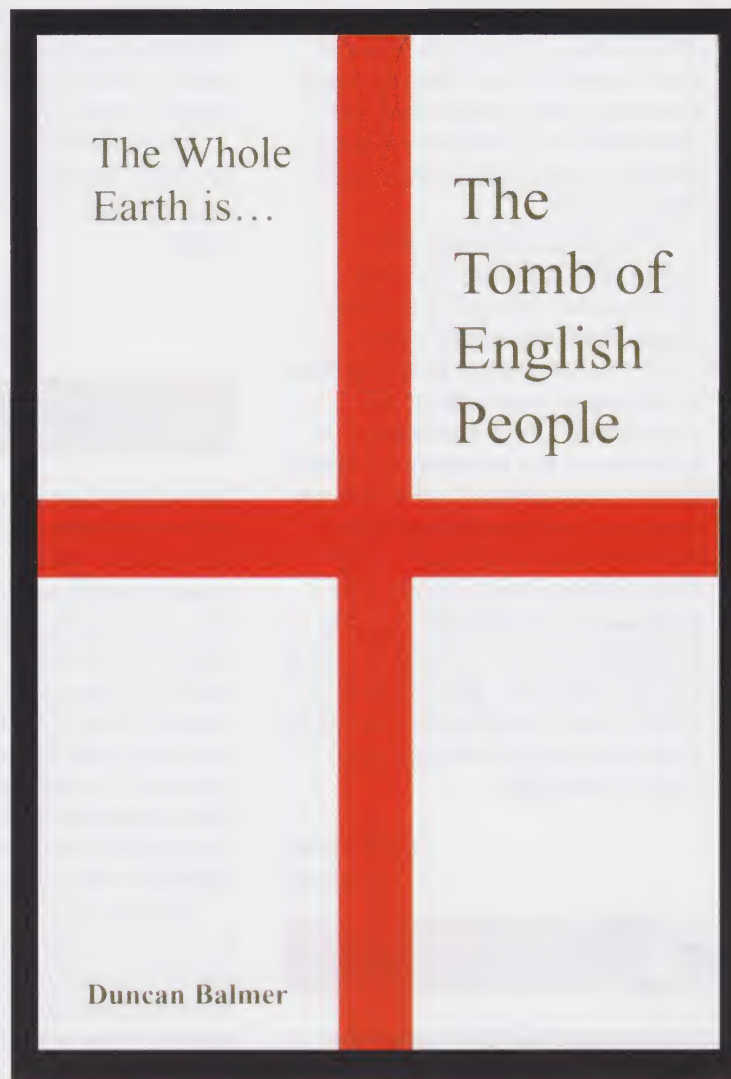

BOOK REVIEW: The Tomb of English People

With St. George's Day being celebrated by BNP members all across England this month, many of our people will no doubt take the opportunity to reflect on our Englishness; what it means to be English and why we should be proud of this. At the same time we can expect the usual slurs from our local Labour councillors and the traitors in the press who, sneering down their noses at us, ask 'what's so good about England anyway?' and 'what does it even mean to be English?' Then there are the 'English' morons who use St. Patrick's Day* as a great opportunity to go out and get drunk, yet do not even know when St. George's Day is, let alone celebrate it. These people would do well to read this book.

The Whole Earth is... The Tomb of English People is an unashamedly Anglo-centric look at the world, and the many things that England has brought to it. The book begins with a competent and concise history of England from the Roman invasions right up to the decline and fall of the British Empire. The sections on England's relationship with the other nations of the British Isles here are particularly well written, and it is refreshing to read an account of these changing relationships that is not tainted by anti-English paranoia. The section on the English legal system is probably the most interesting section of all in this work, and patriots would do well to read this book for this section alone. Apart from this, the book includes chapters on such interesting subjects as the English language; the English contribution to Sport; Ireland and Scotland, and the Colonies and Empire.

This book is by no means perfect, and the author is clearly not a nationalist. His unnecessary and patronising grovelling to the cause of 'Anti-Racism' in the introduction is proof enough of this, and there will no doubt be a good few other passages in the book that will make any nationalist readers roll their eyes. Yet nevertheless, this work is well researched and should serve as a good reference book for all English patriots. It is a competent patriotic work and a good read, and in these dark days of political correctness such contributions to the debate about Englishness are most welcome.

*This is not intended as a slur on anyone who celebrates St. Patrick's Day; it is refreshing to see that this important Saint's day is celebrated by patriots from Ulster and Eire alike. The point here is that it is clearly wrong that St. Patrick's Day is celebrated in England whilst St. George's Day is on the whole ignored.

British Survival? A Lottery? It's up to you!

Regular readers will be aware of the fact that the British National Party has been growing at a fantastic rate over the last few years. Advances in organisation, administration and professionalism combined with electoral success, has seen the party operation expand like never before.

This expansion has its costs though and the ever-increasing need for financing the party machine has been the main strain of late. Funding for more frequent and larger scale professional election campaigns diverts funds away from the day-to-day running of the party, despite them being critical to electoral success as this progress must be accompanied by an increased support infrastructure. The future growth of the party requires further paid staff as well as equipment, but right now the infrastructure in place needs funding to continue to operate efficiently. With this in mind the BNP is now launching the 'British National Lottery' which will hold regular draws throughout the year.

We have all become used to the shock headlines about dubious awards to 'good causes' from the Lotto and this is the reason why many Britons have stopped playing that game. Readers can rest assured that our Lottery will only fund the BNP. Profits will go to the party's central fund to not only help the party operate effectively but to grow and flourish.

The ideal situation would be for the party to have adequate resources to act on any initiative at the drop of a hat, but sadly at present this is not always possible even when such an initiative would not only bring in increased members but finances too. The British National Lottery will hopefully go some way to rectifying this.

As the promoter, I am taking nothing for granted. Only hard work and a willingness of Organisers and other officials to promote the Lottery will see its lofty aims being fulfilled. If you share our ideals, whether as a member or not, I appeal to you all to respond to the advert below and purchase tickets in bulk.

You can help support the BNP by tapping into a market that would not normally put funds our way. Get friends and family involved and I promise you will be surprised at how many folk will purchase tickets for such a worthy cause when ordinarily they would not give a donation. Tickets can be sold to anybody anywhere, they are not just restricted to party events or circles.

For those few members who do not hold with gambling, please accept my apologies for receiving tickets, which are sent out by an automated process and therefore unavoidable. But also remember that we must use every tool at our disposal to further the cause in which we are all so committed to... British survival! Our survival on these islands should not be just a lottery but by supporting this initiative we can give our people more than just a fighting chance.

Kenny Smith, British National Lottery Promoter

MORE THAN JUST A GAME

The British National Party is proud to announce the launch of the British National Lottery. This game will allow members and supporters the opportunity to contribute in a fun way to the growth of the BNP and also the opportunity to win prizes.

The lottery will benefit the most important cause in Britain today... the running and growth of the BNP as the only saviour of our people and nation. All profits will be used for and by the BNP and nothing left over for asylum seekers or one-legged ethnic lesbian associations.

This first Euro Election campaign draw features a first prize of £500, second prize of £100 and a third prize of a year's subscription to the BNP publications Freedom and Identity.

PLAY YOUR PART NOW

Members will automatically be sent a book of tickets to purchase or sell on in their membership bulletins, but further tickets can be purchased by members and supporters by sending a cheque or postal order (made payable to 'British National Lottery') to the promoter at BNL, P.O. Box 5674, Inverness, IV2 7YL. Tickets cost only £1.00 each and can be purchased in any quantity.

The draw will be made on Saturday the 29th of May 2004 and winners will be notified by post. The prizewinners' names will then appear in BNP publications.

Entries must only be sent to B.N.L., P.O. Box 5674, Inverness, IV2 7YL. Any entries submitted elsewhere will be returned to sender and not entered in the draw. Only payments made payable to "British National Lottery" will be entered in the Draw. Incorrect entries will be returned. You must be sixteen or over to play.
